Even when the entire stream was open to fishing, the most accessible, lower end with few natural obstructions for anglers (rhodo, etc) supported the largest brookies in the stream and they were present in good numbers. At the same time the brookies farther up, perhaps a mile to 1.5 miles were smaller in the hemlocks and rhododendron. Another example that contributes to shooting down the ideas that brook trout harvest is a problem on accessible wild trout streams and that cropping is taking place statewide.
