I've had a fantastic spring. Granted this is my first year seriously fishing for trout with the fly rod and I don't get around much, but what I have been fishing has been good to me. No trophies but before this year I had only ever caught one trout on the fly. This year I'm well up toward 50 or 60, I don't really keep count though as getting out is more important than catching if ya ask me. Not getting skunked does feel good though and I've only been skunked once this year so far.

Nice think hatches here in the Perk Valley too. Like I said I never paid a ton of attention before, but there were certainly times this year where I breathed in a sulfur or two while on the creek they were so thick.

As a newbie I'd like to ask what ya all mean by it's over and talk like that. I've also seen a few on here mention it's unethical to fish for trout all summer or dangerous to the fish rather if it's too warm. How does everyone feel about this?? Do you not target trout once the water warms up or do they just not bite or do you hunt down colder water or what?? Help a greenhorn understand please.
