Thank for the response. The information I had on Hilara at the time was from material published in the 50's and 60's. You most certainly could be right.

It's great to hear from someone whose as fascinated with the entomology in our streams and how it relates to our trout and our fishing. From the vantage of my age, I can recall how back in the 60's, those of us who ran along the banks with butterfly nets chasing bugs were sometimes given a wide berth. Nowadays, you younger guys and your knowlege is inspiring.

But, let's not forget those old timers who laid the ground work for that approach. They, Marinaro, Swisher-Richards, Schwiebert, Fox, Caucci-Nastasi, et all, certainly deserve credit for getting flyfishers thinking along those lines. And just think about how much additional depth that extra component adds to our angling day astream!
