For what it's worth, the color of those dot's don't tell the whole story. They only mean that for this particular day of the year, and for as long as stats have been recorded, the streams are above "normal". It does not really indicate anything more than what is happening in the very short term.

The dots could all have been red, indicating low water, for the past two weeks and one storm could have them all blue for a few days and then back to red. The reality being a drought with one big storm in the middle.

With that said, yes, we're having a pretty good year as far as stream flows are concerned. Air temps are starting to get pretty warm and staying there, but our streams are still much better off than in past recent years.
