Hookedonthefly,

With respect to places to fish for carp.....understand that many of the folks on this site are tight lipped about their favorite fishing locations. This is perfectly understandable. Many anglers have spent many days exploring fishing areas and have had to put their time in to locate good spots and they're loathe to broadcast them on the internet. This is particularly true for fish and streams that fly under the radar. Local carp hotspots would certainly qualify.

Personally, if it were me.....I'd prospect for carp by focusing on larger waterways. Begin by heading out on a clear day when the sun is high and the water clear. Walk out on a bridge with polarized glasses and binoculars and just look for fish. You'll see carp and learn a lot about a river's structure with this simple technique. Then go fishing with spin gear and dough balls. When you've found a "carpy" area, wait for low clear water flows and you can target them with fly gear. There are also some good guides on the Susquehanna River who will take you carp fishing and show you some of the tricks of the trade.
