Fair enough Troutbert. Rosgen is not the only engineer in this field and he certainly has his detractors, but we should give him his due and recognize that he has been studying streams for decades. He is in the business of stabilizing and enhancing stream reaches, and anyone who engages in that sort of thing is likely to have some screw-ups. Streams have a way of making a monkey out of the best engineers. I am also a fan of Dave Derrick, an engineer out of the Corps' Waterways Experiment Station in Vicksburg, MS. I believe he has recently retired and formed his own consultancy. He generally has a lighter hand than Rosgen.
