In fishing some streams that have less reliable trico hatches I have seen some major variation in the hatch from day to day...one day there would be a blizzard, the next not so much. But I wouldn't say there were zero bugs on the light days, you will usually still see some small clouds. Sometimes the fish won't be too active, but will usually rise for a short period. I find on these streams some sections have trikes others don't. If you're trying to figure it out, look for the clouds over the riffles. If you can't find any, fish terrestrials or go home.
