Looks like a possibility of a T-storm in the evening.

We'll probably get some storms this week too. If the stream is a little off color Saturday, we're living large. Some of my best days fishing tricos have been when the stream has like a foot of visibility. The fish often suspend just under the surface, and they're very visible. Since they're so close to the surface, their cone of vision is very narrow - you can get close without them seeing you, and perfect casts and drag are less of an issue.

Keep your fingers crossed - we might just luck out...

BTW - you already know the knots for adding a dropper to a nymph rig. It'll take like 2 minutes to explain it to you, and I'll have my knot teaching kit along just in case. A clinch knot and a double surgeon's knot is all you need to know.

I was walked by my best friends this morning along the Heritage Stretch and the water is getting very clear. Lots of bugs and fish rising to them in spots. A good rain this week would be great.

I took a good look at some of the water that was surveyed last week and saw very little surface activity, yet from what I saw last week there are plenty of fish lurking there. So if they are not on top they could be feeding down low. Just saying the Trico may not be the only game in town, so bring some tiny nymphs or small egg patterns for the lurkers.
