As much as I love to chronicle and 'catch' as much nature as I can, hunting does not appeal to me because it is a bloodsport.

I absolutely take and enjoy fish on occasion, but there is some sort of internal differentiation between fish and mammals/birds. I'm pretty sure that difference is blood, but I'm not completely sure precisely where the mental separation lies.

That said, (as a non-hunter) hunting appeals to me because it throws you into God's country with little human sound to muck the surroundings. Being stuck in a single tree for hours on end with no promise of a sighting, though, sounds awful. At least I can move on to another pool in a stream and there's always a chance of that hidden lunker behind its lone rock.

Do hunters move much? I know scouting and all should position you with good probability, but I don't know a lot of the details involved.
