They don't do 'releases' on the Codorus. I've been told that they 'exercise' the dam's release gates from time to time, and I've heard its noticeable when they do that. Other than that, the flow is adjusted based on the demand for cold water at the paper mill downstream, and those are small adjustments that don't seem to change the fishing. If the water is really up, its because some weather event has the west branch swollen, and that typically doesn't last more than a couple of days.

They also did some maintenance on those gates earlier this year, and that may have resulted in some unusual patterns that some of you may have seen.
