Most of the time when I fish these small drainages for wild trout I just wear my Redwing work boots (no hip boots or waders). They are comfortable, offer good support to the feet on rough or steep terrain and practically force me to stay out of the water. Staying out of the water is always a good tactic when fishing small streams. Rock hopping across the stream at almost any location is usually not a problem. I always fish the side of the stream that keeps my shadow off of the water if sun is a factor. Never step on any log or debris that makes contact with the water. These are just a few tactics that I like to use to minimize the amount of fished spooked.
