

Subject: : Beginner Forum

Topic: : Dry Fly Fishing

Re: Dry Fly Fishing

Author: : Stagger_Lee

Date: : 2013/7/29 7:15:11

URL:

Quote:

Krayfish wrote:

Next time you spy one on top, try this.....before you cast or worry about what the fish is taking, look. Look at where the fish is holding. Look at the angle you have to approach him. Look at how many different currents exist between you and your target. Is your spot the best possible option? Can you move a little to give yourself a better angle? Can you move slightly and it eliminates some of the water flowing at different speeds? If you look before you leap, I'll bet you bring more to net.

Good advice and u must be friends w/ WTT. One of the 1st things he told me when I saw him on Sat was, and I paraphrase, "Many guys gear up, see a fish rise, get in quickly and cast for 5 mins and move on. I like to look at the water for awhile, get a feel what is happening, watch what they are doing, where I should cast from," etc.

I think I get a lil anxious tho I'll watch a lil and have patience once I start, will work areas more than 5 mins. I found myself doing this (observing) more in the afternoon/evening, and also worked different angles ... had much more interest and takes.

///Seems I should pick up a hook file from what some of u guys have said