A more simple way of saying some of that, regarding #1 and #4, is that in Allegheny (wild) fish, patterning tends to end at the in the middle of the side. There can be patterns to the middle, but typically no yellow or red spots below middle.

In Susky fish, the lower flank often has yellow and/or red spots, farther down than Allegheny fish.

i.e. I'm not sure it's the lateral line itself, which is usually higher on the fish. It's the midpoint of the side. There are exceptions, but it's true on the vast majority of fish I've caught in each respective watershed.
