I grew up fishing Six Mile Run but have not fished it in quite a few years tho have driven over and by it fairly recently. It takes a lot of pressure early but that tapers off after the stocking ends. It's brushy most places so a short rod is advised. Given the amount of rain we've had, it's probably in much better shape this time of year than it might otherwise be. Terrestrials work well this time of year. There used to be several beaver dams on the stream but I imagine those have washed out and moved over the years. Note that it is a very "snakey" area with quite a few rattlesnakes. Watch where you put your hands and feet.
