I also realize this question has been asked many times on the forum, just looking for some feedback.
Thanks.

I think people just want to know from a curiosity standpoint. They are trying to learn and there are some fish with blended characteristics. I DON'T think most people are being elitist about it.

Now, you might see Geo, Shane, and me jokingly busting each other's nuts about whether a fish is a stocker, but we are just being goofs. Geo asked me last night if an Arctic Char I caught was a stocker....that's just us.

I do prefer to fish for wild fish, but that is primarily because of the locations where wild fish are found and because they are quite spectacular in their coloration. That being said, I take my kids for stocker trout, because they are in locations easy for the kids to get to and easier for them to catch.
