There are many small streams that are not thick with brush, so the casting is much easier. Fish one of those streams instead, and you'll find it much more enjoyable.

Few times I've gone small stream fishing they have had thick brush. Where does one find these less "thick with brush" small streams?

On state forests and gamelands and other public lands.

There is a whole range of brushiness, from being fairly easy to fish for someone experienced, to being very nearly impossible, even for the experienced, just choked with brush.

Kistler Run is extreme. It's an alder swamp stream, and it's a mess. If you just explore around on public lands, there is a huge mileage of streams that are far more open than Kistler. Just about all the freestoners you hear people talking about on here are less thick with brush than Kistler.

Go fishing with Foxgap, or anyone else in your area who makes the offer. They'll show you some streams that are possible to fish, and how to go about it.
