Cool report and pics Goro...even if no fish were caught.

It's a true limestone spring...think Letort or Big Spring, just smaller scale. The fish on those streams are often like ghosts, laying in the weed beds rarely to be seen, but they're there. I'm not saying Trindle is on the same par as those two, but it has fish in it. I know a couple guys who catch large wild Browns in the Connie in the Winter...these fish undoubtedly hang out in the mouths or lower reaches of streams like Letort and Trindle during the Summer.

I fished it once, took home a skunk (had one good look from a smallish Bow, but no hookups) and decided there was better water nearby. As you noted, it's a royal PITA to fish. From what I understand a lot of the biomass at the time of the last Class A survey on it was concentrated in a large, slow pool created by a small low head dam. That dam is now gone, and so is its holding water. You probably saw the remnants of it...that's where I got the one swipe when I fished it.
