Troutbert: In the Bucks case, it is possible that there was a blockage in earlier years that prevented trout from moving into this creek at its mouth. I have determine what kind of structure was at the mouth and whether the structure at the mouth has deteriorated or was modified by nature or man in the recent past following one of the floods.

In the Berks case, the improvement I have been told has to do with a spring that has either appeared or has begun flowing again well downstream in the previously warm part of the drainage basin. There are now wild trout present in this stretch.
