I've made several bamboo rods from Anglers Roost, and first made wood cases for them (from trim wood stock) before I ordered. They have lengthwise "channels and ribs" lined with felt that the pieces fit into.

When I received the blanks, they went right into the case so they never had a chance to take a set during the build or after. The rods stay nice & straight.

If an old rod needs straightening, it might be beneficial if the same approach was taken to store the rod during the straightening process & thereafter. If anybody wants a photo, just message me your email and I'll send one off. It's as fun making the case as it is building the rod.
