Hammer, I will be wading. The Clarion is an interesting and challenging river to fish. It gets float fished a lot and the biggest wild browns seem to get their radar up when there is a canoe or raft on the river. A number of times I have been experiencing good fishing and then all at once the bite shuts down. The next thing that happens is a canoe or pontoon boat coming floating down the river. It usually takes an hour or more for the bite to start up again. I am not saying that you cannot catch trophy browns float fishing, I am just saying that from my experience you are less likely to. The really big browns only seem to feed for about an hour and a half per day and I want to maximize my chances by employing stealth tactics.

Thanks LongWader

That rivers been discussed between me and some friends as one we'd like to fish sometime. A Clackacraft would likely make the trip with also.

Good points made about fish sensing a boats presence. We have experienced all too well about how some fish, mainly bigger fish, can react to a boats presence on the Delaware.
