Great news to hear.....and some interesting results with respect to woody cover.

Watching a stream recover through abatement of systemic problems of effluent and acid mine effects and transition to a stream where habitat becomes more important is exciting. In this case, survey results indicate (or seem to indicate) that population growth of brook trout (ST) may now depend largely on holding water and cover.

If it is practicable to do so, I'd think this section would be an excellent candidate for a TU habitat improvement project followed by before and after population surveys.
