Gfen is correct that the two tip sections should be the same taper. Not a wet and a dry. At least on that rod. There may be some cheap post WWII Japanese rods with two different tapers, but not that one. Two tips in case one breaks as gfen said, also if you will be fishing it a lot... it allows you to alternate and rest one tip while using the other. It helps to keep from getting a set in one.

I don't mean carry both with you. I mean use one one day, and the other the next while the first one is allowed to rest.

Its only a suggestion.
