Warmouth is a completely different fish and is even different shaped to some extent. It is way more common in Ohio. My understanding was that they are kind of rare in PA, and limited to Western PA, but that of course could be wrong. But even though they have bigger mouths and a little bit toothy, I don't think they are any tougher than bluegills. They actually seem to be on the soft side compared to bluegills. I have some in one of my ponds. I'm betting Patrick knows what they look like.
