geebee, for blues you want to move the popper/fly fast, they like it better than letting it sit. you can't move a fly or lure fast enough for them.

i've found both which is why i suggested the opposite...

A bud at work was out on the Chessie yesterday and couldn't hook anything in the middle of a bait ball assault - i told him to cast the metal, count to 10 to let it sink then strip it so it was below the ball.

fish like an easy meal sometimes i figure. pretty hard to count to 30 though when bait is busting right in front of you though.

i've also picked up nice blues on poppers and sliders fished on a 350gr sinking line swung or dead drifted in fast current.

short hard spaced strips make the fly dip and the pause makes it rise. that can be deadly in point rips or current seams.

blues can be like the spanish inquisition sometimes, you just gotta figure them out, many times its the unexpected that works..

cheers.
