I think its a shame more people don't care that much about the natives. Return on investment and making the conservationist posers happy are more important than maintaining the fishery. It's pretty pathetic how many once great native brook trout streams and rivers in the east are now being managed by state programs for browns and rainbows simply because they grow bigger, are easier to sustain, and generate more income. The upper end of big spring is one of few places that would fit the wbte program well.
