I don't know for sure. But if there were anywhere I'd expect heritage strain brookies to exist intact, this would probably be it.

Not that it matters a whole awful lot to me. Elsewhere in the state, our brookies are likely a mix of different heritage strains (rather than the original heritage strain for that stream), with maybe a little stocky thrown in for good measure. I don't have less respect for them.

If you throw out the strain argument, you still have native vs. introduced. Even that doesn't hold a lot of sway for me.

It's a resource. Those who enjoy the resource are mostly fishermen. So long as what they want isn't ecologically damaging, it's fishermen's desires that hold sway with me, rather than some sense of preserving a certain strain. That said, if fishermen's wishes are native fish, or even heritage strain, well, that does hold sway.
