I've fished with salmonoid and he's a real pro in these conditions with his "dapping" approach. In low/clear conditions I often skip too much water I think, just looking for the prime lies. Salmonoid will often still pull fish out of the less obvious (or less obvious to me anyway) spots.

I'll often use a similar technique, but I employ an additional split shot fairly close to the Bugger...sinks quicker and gives you a little more weight to control the "dapping" with.

Did you compare those pics to your other photos of that stream? Were any of those Browns "photographed" before?
