It really is a beautiful area and I only scratched the surface of this stretch. I still have about 3.5 miles to explore. The reason I couldn't fish it sooner was that the last time I drove all the way up there - 4 hours from home - heavy rains hit the area and blew the water out to a cocoa-brown tint that was all but un-fishable. It would've made for a very slow day, so I retreated to a different place back closer to home. Thankfully, it's finally back to its normal, medium-stained, irrigation season color. Almost perfect in that it is light enough to fish pale-colored dries on the surface and do some sight casting but still dark enough to give you a little bit of stealth to get closer to the fish.
