Historical research showing that it was used for commerce. Being able to float a canoe down the creek means absolutely nothing.

The two notable cases were the Little Juniata and the Lehigh.

In a waterway that doesn't meet this requirement the landowner who owns the bank also owns out to midway of the creek. The other bank owner has the other half.

If the stream ran through an area which was private on one side, and public on the other, you would be within rights to stand in the middle of the stream, but could not access or even stand, on the far side of the stream, regardless of "high water mark."
