Yeah, it's a little misleading.

There are, of course, negatives too. And ultimately, like everything, it's about whether the benefits are worth the cost. But outright claiming zero benefits (or zero costs) immediately categorizes that claim into the "biased rhetoric" category, which should be immediately dismissed.

but most of the studies i've read and residents complaints i've heard (and received) is a) the concentration of the income benefits and b) the potential widespread clean up costs.

in short, if I live local and I don't have a lease, why am I eventually through Town, State or Federal taxes (or all three) going to have to pay for the de-contamination.

The land that our Rights and Minerals Trust's own effectively can never be re-zoned for anything until decontamination is proven.

and you can bet that if your neighbour doesn't have a lease and his land gets contaminated, he'll sue your ass.

Western leases are much much easier for us 😊
