

Subject: : Fly Fishing Locations

Topic: : Montana Advice

Re: Montana Advice

Author: : Mike

Date: : 2013/10/17 10:05:10

URL:

I have bicycle toured and camped through a substantial portion of SW Montana. Depending upon how far SW you want to go in Montana, the Beaverhead River is well known as it the Big Hole River. I have a particular liking for the Big Hole Valley as the scenery is something to behold. There is also a beautiful limestone-like spring creek north of Dillon and just off the main road that made me want to stop pedaling and pull out rod. My biologist colleagues tell me that I made a mistake....I should have fished. Camping is great in Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming, and if you are looking to save a lot of money as well as get the entire outdoor experience, I'd recommend it. It is so enjoyable in the west, in fact, that my wife and I prefer it over cabins and motels. We have camped primarily in National Forest campgrounds, but I have seen campsites established at fishing access points along some of the major, well-known fishing rivers, but I have no experience with those.