The gauge is at 421 cfs and dropping nicely (probably about 30 cfs/ hour), was over 500 at one point this morning. And, the turbidity gauge is dropping as well.

The forecast is calling for showers tomorrow, and about .3 inches of rain, but the radar is showing that most of the storm system that hit last night is over us, and everything else is missing Erie, with the chance that a few small green splotches may clip us.

Don't hold me to this, and I don't want to make you waste a trip. But I would think that, all other things being equal, the streams continuing to steadily clear, and no more major rains happening today and tonight, there will be at least a few streams tomorrow with prime conditions, and a good run of some fresh fish. Of course, steelhead fishing isn't an exact science, as I think we've all learned.
