Thanks for the replies, guys. There are some great suggestions coming in and lots of food for thought.

I must say that after posting this thread, I gave Winston a call to ask a few questions and also ask what their thoughts were on this very topic as far as their product offerings goes.

As expected, the product rep brought up the Winston WT (aka Winston Traditional), but he also pointed me toward the newer Boron III LS, a newer offering specifically designed to give light line offerings a bit more push (medium-fast action) while still preserving the light presentation I'm after. It looks nice, the product description looks spot-on for what I'm after, but I have zero feedback on this rod from real-world users. Anyone have any experience with it?

The only thing I find a little tacky on this rod is the optional skelontized aluminum/graphite real seat, but the more traditional looking nickel silver/burled wood offering is right up my alley. I'm feeling a bit conservative and leaning toward the WT, but this newer rod sounds extremely close to what I'm after. Any given day of the week, my mood could change and this one might follow me home.
