What a great report.

I think there's a pretty common view that night fishing is a summertime game and back in my night fishing days I certainly did this mostly in summer. However, I can remember some slamming good nights in mid to late October for both bass and trout when surface flies and lures were hit with abandon. You miss a lot of strikes but the thrill is worth it and the ones you do tend to stick are often large. I recall nights when you couldn't throw a surface lure due to the leaves or had to use something weedless - but the fish still wanted it. I don't recall night fishing in Nov but I'd guess that on Limestone streams that the night bite would still be good and maybe even through winter(?).
