Jack, feeling your pain. I've made it out only a handful of times this year. My job has become so demanding that after 25 years running the show I'm getting out. My family needs to have me involved in their lives and I need to spend time pursuing life outside of my current job. Good luck finding a balance.

It's all about finding the proper balance, which can be different for every person. Before I changed jobs, I fished because I wanted to escape the stress of the work world. But when you are on the stream and your mind isn't clear and unmuddled, that says that the work side had invaded too far. I don't think that I fish any more now than I did a year ago but I fish with a mind that is not invaded with work pressures. How much we fish and the value we put on it depends where our priorities are. Again, there is not necessarily a right answer to this as someone else's priorities may not be my own and vice versa. And fishing (or not) may not be the root cause of whatever may be going on. But unless you are abandoning other obligations, I don't think fishing hurts 😊
