Here's the issue I have with thinking that it's all on the friend to replace the rod, or buy the broken rod from you...If it's not a brand new rod, many of your own actions (jamming the rod tip into trees, smacking shot or beadhead flies into the rod while casting, wrapping line around the tip, etc) over the course of owning the rod could have contributed to the ultimate failure. Maybe the next time you would've went to put a bend in the rod it would have snapped on you instead of your buddy? Depends on the scenario I guess. A buddy snapping a rod over his knee is different than a rod breaking in the process of reasonably normal use.
