I've lent quite a few rods for people to use steelhead fishing and prepared myself for the worst every time. The amount of busted rods I see there is second to none, to the point that its almost commonplace.

^No doubt. Fly rods are designed first to cast and second to fight fish. Guys lock down their drag and try to horse in fish and/or raise their rod high when landing fish and bent the rod like a pretzel.

(not surprizing) Jack gave sound legal advice without the legaleeze...(a bailee for whose sole benefit property has been bailed must exercise extraordinary care for the property. The bailee can use the property only in the manner authorized by the terms of the bailment. The bailee is liable for all injuries to the property from failure to properly care for or use it.) as to the liability of your friend.

And Maurice gave a good life's lesson advice about the incident.

Hopefully your buddy will make good on the rod and all will be well.
