It's stories like this about our more famous streams that is the reason I avoid them. Can the reputation of a stream literally compensate the fishing. We read about others and their experiences of the famous stream of yesteryear and long to make memories of our own. Streams change and things go on. The state of Pa has much to offer and we are blessed with so many streams that we overlook many and I prefer them. It's a good thing that the people who fish will continue to go where others have gone hoping to have the same success. It's a blessing that some streams draw more fisherman.

Funny thing. You can usually tell others (fisherman) intentions. They know if they are imposing. They will not talk or draw eye contact. When I fish around other people, I become talkative. I want to share the stream and I have fond memories of the people I have met on crowded streams. It's unfortunate but some people just have no desire to find out anything for themselves. If he is fishing there then there must be fish there. There are people who fish and there are fisherman.

I'd rather catch chubs alone on a no-name crick, than a stocked trout in a crowd no matter how famous and prestigious the stream.

To each his own.
