The end result would be a stream with 1 giant bull trout. That fish would then feed on deer and brookie fishermen.

Brookies are fine, they are pretty and also weak. If you aren't sure, I'll reference big spring. If a so-so brookie fishery can become a great brown trout fishery, let's go!

I am bound by contract to drag Becker into 1st of my posts, so here we go. It has been documented that there are populations of wild brookies near the feeders throughout the Lehigh. I want you to spearhead a movement to stop stocking the Lehigh so the brook trout can be protected and the population can reach its potential. I'll be your support system. We should be able to get a webpage up by midnight Saturday. You in? I'll work on Shane in the meantime

Why must you make this thread into a complete farce, just because you think you know a little bit about trout and brookies in particular. You don't know anything about brook trout, it's clear from your posts in the past. So my suggestion to you is write about fishing large rivers which is something you think you know about, and otherwise keep your lame opinions about small stream fishing to yourself.
