The concern about the snails is not that they are non-native.

It has to do with their effects in the stream. Some of the articles linked describe that.

I understand this. I tried to post both of my posts as one, but they accidentally got cut off (I was trying to clean up cream soda off of the keyboard and it posted, lol). I don't think that there is much we can do to stop invasive species. They will find a way into new streams carried by people or other animals. That is inevitable. I am saying that generally people blow how much impact these critters will really have on a certain environment out of proportion and when we choose to spread an invasive species because we see it as "desirable" for some reason it is okay.
