I'm not sure exactly what you mean about honestly meeting the elements. I do understand what it's like to be out in the cold when your nose hairs are stiff and your gloves freeze to everything you touch. When the snow makes that crunching sound it only makes when the temp is below zero and how the air enters your lungs sharply. When the animals you feed are just that much more hungry and happy to see you, especially when you replace ice with water. Honestly, winter is just plain cold, not evil, just cold. It was about 10 degrees all day today. Too cold for November and my sons heading North Monday for Steelhead. Hopefully it will warm up just a bit.
