

---

Subject: : Gear Talk

Topic: : flourocarbon tippet

Re: flourocarbon tippet

Author: : JustFish

Date: : 2009/3/9 14:15:11

URL:

Quote:

salvelinusfontinalis wrote:

Well you have two options to play them differntly than just playing them longer.

1) when sight fishing, think of a plan of attack and make cenerios in your head. ex: If the fish moves this way i can bank him almost immdeiately by swinging my rod this way. Thats just one example but it works.

2) Do what i do and use a full flex rod. Full flex rods protect tippets better than fast action rods.

Either way, i never have a problem with breaking off using 6x and 7x flouro. BTW 8x is way way too small.

Your 1) I can see working very well for small 8-10 inch fish. But if you hook into a big fish....I am not sure you can dictate the fight right off the bat to make 1) work. Whether you have a full flex rod or not.IMHO

If fluro works for u,fine. But I am not convinced it is necessary for trout. Whether they're wild or stocked. Again IMHO

BTW I don't use 8x last time was two years ago, the smallest I go is 6 and on rare occasions 7. I was referring to the guys that fish that stream, not me personally. 😊 I predominately use hand tied leaders which I have found work a hell of a lot better than the one mold tapered ones. The only time I wouldn't use one is if there is a butt load of vegetation.

I am not convinced fish are leader shy. I am convinced that it is your presentation. 🙄

Me personally...I think fluro is a gimmick.