Remember fellas, this is the "Beginner Forum" which was put here for those looking to ask questions and receive help to get them started FFing. The whole idea of this forum is to make an effort to help these beginners and not disparage or discourage them.

Learning to FF, or really learning to do anything for that matter, is often a progression. Learn and master the basics and the easier techniques, and move on to more difficult things to master.
crawl > walk > run

There are plenty of threads and posts in the other forums that give some really good info on nymphing without indies. But again, this is beginners forum.

So just because it's not "your way" that a beginner should start it's not "beginner appropriate", not helpful, and not needed. Yeah okay.

There's more than one way to skin a cat in most instances, and a beginner should be aware of that fact instead of only being taught the "easiest" way. You hit on that downfall yourself, that's why most fly fishers only "crawl" because they don't know any other way exists. I think all that was said was the mention of other options. I don't see why giving a beginner options would be discouraged. But that's the world we live in now, how dare someone think for themselves, the thought of the masses is the only accepted thought.

I've never used an indicator in my life, I don't feel I need to because of how I was taught as a beginner, so I'll tell my mentors they taught me wrong.
