para- Keep at it. I first got into flyfishing in 1995. Messed around with it for a couple of years and kinda drifted away from it. Probably more golf.

Anyway about 5 years ago I got back into it- most of my friends are fly fishers.
(although I frequently bring up my displeasure for them not helping me more)

By all means get out there beat the waters. I have mentioned many times I wish I started out of warm water- you get to work on general casting, get the feel of hook sets, and actually catch some fish.

Flyfishing is/was never easy for me but if you are intersted enough it will come.

There is no way to sit with someone or take a class or two that will replace actual experiences on stream. Don't go by when people says "years" in terms of learning either. It's how many times you go a year that really makes the diiference.

The only way I could fly fish more is if there was a limestone spring creek in Pittsburgh. Then there's the whole tying thing- which the sooner you get into it- you will be happier later (I still struggle tying).

Good luck!
