When i began fly fishing, i was taught dry fly casting first for a few years and then got into sub surface fishing with nymphs and wooly buggers this last year.

All of the flies the other fellas are recommending are spot on for how i progressed as i tried new flies and new techniques. When i was dry fly fishing, i tried all different types, but it seemed like a deer hair caddis was always a reliable choice when i wanted to try dry flies. Even when the fish weren't always rising, a caddis would be a safe bet to land one or two fish if i kept at it.

I've used all the nymphs, and wet flies the others have suggested and their all flies that will get you some hits. If you keep your flies small and work on your drifts and presentation i think that is what makes all the difference when you're using proven flies like the ones suggested.
