Nice. I got out today and caught a few Brookies. Nothing spectacular and the fishing was actually kinda slow for the relatively good (for Winter anyway) conditions. Mainly I think because the stream I picked was new to me and after a mile or so hike in, it turned out to be pretty choked with young forest growth. It was already noon and I was kinda pot committed at that point so I stuck it out and fished the spots I could. It also turned out to be one of those "constant velocity" streams...At a certain medium-ish gradient small streams seem to not make much habitat. They don't slow down enough to make bends and corner holes, yet they're not steep enough to make any plunges either.

Was nice to be out and catch my first fish of 2019 though. It's become a bit of a tradition for me to get out on NYD. Wind didn't bother me much either, though I was tucked behind a pretty good sized ridge.
