I have found that being flexible and willing to change your rig to meet the existing depth of water and flow rate are critical. Sometimes tight lining, sometimes indicator nymphing, sometimes shot added, shot taken off, drop shot or no shot. If you continue to fish varying depth and flow conditions with the same set up all day you will catch a fair number of fish in certain areas and swear other areas are void of fish (even if you know they are in there). If the fish are looking up put the dredging nymphs away and fish some soft hackles higher in the column. I'm getting better at it but still have a whole lot to learn. I have over many years learned the hard way that fishing in a rut is not the answer to success.
