Tight lining and euro nymphing are very similar concepts. Euro nymphing just took tight lining techniques and optimized them. So yes he may not be asking for specific help on Euro Nymphing, but everything he can do to optimize his rig towards a euro nymphing setup will yield better strike detection, less snags, and more fish. But glad you can point this out Ryan, with offering zero suggestions to the OP. A drop shot rig, will look eerily similar to a Czech style rig... while a French style will be much different. But conceptually very similar. Guides will use drop shot rigs to obtain similar results as euro nymphing, but much easier to cast and implement for people not used to the techniques.

When I was guiding, professionally. I would never try euro nymphing with a client unless they where familiar or wanted to try it. While a drop shot rig they could cast with ease, but also obtaining similar results as straight euro nymphing through the same beat.
