My reputation for frugality precedes me, so take this for what it is worth: if I was such as to be willing to spend $550 for a fly rod, I couldn't imagine an extra $200 would be anything more than a minor inconvenience (that is, the slight bother of pulling two more paper notes from my wallet).

My most expensive rod was my saltwater rod. Which was around $450. All of my fresh water rods are around $150. This is including line, reel and rod. So an extra $200 would be an inconvenience considering I was recently laid off from work and to boot I have fished with friends higher end rods and don't see the point in spending the extra cash. When in the end they both get the job done.
