Personally, I like a light rain or mist, and slightly cooler than average temps. Hopefully this combo will happen in the middle of a major hatch cycle. This occurred a few years ago on Spring Ck., and the Sulpher fishing was superb, and earlier than usual for a couple hrs. When it cleared off, it was about 45 min. til dark, and suddenly the same fish became very hard to fool. Went back to my pet nymph under dry combo for some icing on the cake. Have seen the same thing happen on stocked streams as well. When the bugs can't dry their wing to take off, they become sitting ducks for hungry trout.
